BIFM to change its name to reflect greater focus on workplace issues and pursue chartered status
by Mark Ellingham • Facilities management, News

The British Institute of Facilities Management (BIFM) has today announced plans to embrace 'workplace' as a key 'differentiator' for its members and to help establish facilities management as a chartered profession. The manifesto for change announced by BIFM Chair Stephen Routs, sets out to 'reposition facilities management, emphasising its ability to make a real contribution to organisations' performance'. It sets the institute the 'twin tasks of helping members to improve their skills and their status to meet the needs of modern organisations, and to raise the profile of facilities management and the understanding of the value it

The earliest definition of facility management

Workplace was at its core

In the 1970s, Facility Management was first used to describe a field of study that embraced “...the design and management of workplaces and their impact on the business conducted by the organisations that occupied them” (Price, 2007).
